Numerous studies have shown that enactment of laws and creation of national policies and programs to support breastfeeding, like the increased maternity benefits for working women, leads to marked improvements in social, health and economic development outcomes.

While the Expanded Maternity Law or RA 11210 aims to increase the number of breastfeeding mothers, a considerable number of the labor force, were unable to enjoy the benefits and assistance of the said Act. These are the women working the informal economy who are non-members of the Social Security System.

Peer-reviewed research has quantified the economic toll that inadequate breastfeeding takes on individuals, communities and countries, and has found that the current cost to the Philippine health care system due to inadequate breastfeeding is around US$16.3 million per year, and future cognitive losses of US$2.3 billion a year owing to reduced development and earning potential can be expected. The costs of infant formula also significantly reduce a family’s disposable income. Providing a maternity benefit to women workers in the informal economy equivalent to around US$174 per mother is paltry compared to the potential economic benefits of improving breastfeeding rates at population level. In fact, according to the same study, the estimated cost of a 14-week maternity leave is only 5% of the cost of not breastfeeding in the Philippines (source: https://onlinelibrary.wiley.com/doi/10.1111/mcn.13098)

Therefore, a maternity benefit for women workers in the informal economy is not just a social justice measure and an important way to address the multiple burdens and increased vulnerabilities of women who are also mothers and informal workers, it also leads to demonstrable and quantifiable health outcomes at the population level. Without cash benefits to replace income, many low-income informal economy workers cannot take maternity leave.

For these reasons, the immediate passage of this measure is earnestly sought.
